A RESTRICTED RETURN

Erotic City is back to its full page-and-a-half splendor after two months of appearing as a mere shell—a measly 250 words. It's kinda like that nostalgic PDX carpet (@pdxcarpet) that you ignored and even hated while having the privilege to walk on but threw a fit when it was removed. Well, your tantrums worked, just like they did for the return of the carpet earlier this year, and we're grateful you missed E.C. (Admittedly, we only heard from two people, and one lived in Florida, but it's the thought that counts!)

Being back to full length doesn't come without some new guidelines, however. I'm not supposed to delve into political tangents, insult paying advertisers, or write negatively about their establishments (apparently, non-advertisers and those that don't pay their bills are still fair game), and "absolutely no references to pornographic material that feature persons of short stature"—and I quote. When I first received these new precepts, my immediate reaction was, "well, WTF in the actual FUCK am I going to write about then?!" Talk about castration! Oh, and I'm supposed to "refrain from incessant use of profanity." Whatever, dude.

But we'll still make it fun. I'm not foreign to pushing the limits, and if I lose this gig, oh well... I'm a certified badass with a crochet hook, and I've been working on a side hustle anyway. Available soon and customizable with any expression you desire!

P-TOWN HAPS

Let's switch gears for a moment and talk about what's happening around the industry in August. All joking and sarcasm aside, this event I'm about to mention is for a great cause, and everyone should stop by and check it out. Devils Point and Lucky Devil are holding their 16th Annual Bikini Car & Dog Wash on Sunday, August 7, from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m., outside of Lucky Devil at 633 SE Powell Blvd. It's a benefit for Family Dogs New Life Shelter (@fdnewlife)—a no-kill shelter, so come support a great cause while seeing the sexiest dog washers you've ever laid eyes upon!

Next up is The Lounge's 2nd Annual Pool Bash on Wednesday, August 17, at 9 p.m. Based on last year, you won't want to miss this crazy night! Then, later this month, Star's Cabaret in Salem has something special for all you ladies out there. On Sunday, August 28, at 7 p.m., Stars presents Hunks All Male Revue—you can get your tickets ahead of time at HunksTheShow.com!

COMPETITIONS & PAGEANTS

It's been a busy year for events already—now that we can actually have them again! Among the latest to take place were presented by DJ Dick Hennessy: The 4th Annual Motorbooty Twerking Competition in June and the 11th Annual Vagina Beauty Pageant last month.

Congratulations to Motorbooty 2022 Champion Nia (@niagiselle_) from Golden Dragon!

Also, awesome performances by Catalina from Club SinRock, placing 2nd, and Miss Jones from The Lounge, placing 3rd! You can check out additional coverage of Motorbooty 2022 on page 36, and we'll have full coverage of the Vagina Beauty Pageant in September's issue, so make sure to grab a copy!

But wait! There's more—two more, to be precise! That's right, citizenry of our beloved industry, we have two more events for you this year! In September, DJ Dick Hennessy will bring you his 8th Annual Best Breasts of the West Contest and then we close out '22 with a bang, bringing you Miss Exotic Oregon 2023 in October and November!

That's all for this month, folks. Don't let that summertime heat frazzle the razzle in your dazzle!

Support your local businesses, including every industry business within these pages.

ALL I WANT FOR MY BIRTHDAY ARE THESE BAND REUNIONS (And Why They Won't Happen)

By Blazer Sparrow

I try not to doxx myself too much in this widely-read rag, but—full disclosure—my birthday is in August, so I figured I'd use this month's column to make a little wish list of acts I'd love to see in some gaudy, nostalgia-drenched, cash-grab reunion before I die. These are all groups where everyone is still alive, so if any of you are out there and reading this for some reason, make my dreams come true. Please and thank you.

Thanks to Coachella, there really isn't any pop group under the sun that hasn't done a blatantly financially-influenced reunion. A friend asked me which '90s band I'd like to see reunited a while back, and we both realized they all already have. I'm also well aware that seeing a decades-older version of some '80s alt legends is not going to be the same as seeing them in their prime. However, I think the following acts have been defunct for so long it would probably be worth the overpriced ticket and garbage stadium sound.

Keep in mind this is also a wish list. Guaranteed, none of these reunions will ever actually happen, and I'll explain why. But still, it's my birthday, and a man can dream, right?

Talking Heads

Everyone is still alive. They're not too old. This is a possibility. Granted, if Talking Heads were gonna reunite, I would want the full post-1980 workout tape extravaganza, and without Bernie Worrell, that would be a little lackluster. The only other mind-blowing synth player I could think to realistically replace him would be Ikey Owens, and he's dead too. Regardless, the four core cats are still kicking. David's still performing anyway, and the songs are the songs, but it's just not the same. A reunion like this could make Coachella worth the price of admission again, and they should do it before they're all in their 80s. But alas, I do believe hell would freeze over first. David thinks he's too good for Tina, Chris, and Jerry. "Miles apart musically," as he once put it. And although I haven't read Chris's recent memoir, Bob Lefsetz did an excellent interview with him about it (not that Lefsetz has ever done non-excellent interviews), and it sounds like David had a foot out the door since day one—or "day two really," as Chris put it. I just don't see them realistically making up, but man, that would be a birthday wish come true.

The Smiths

Yes, I know Morrissey is an unapologetically insufferable twat, but let's be real... we all, collectively, don't care. It could be the consistency or the charm, but we've all just sort of accepted him and his many, many flaws. The rest of the band, however... And it's such a shame because if they could just bear to stand next to each other on stage, they could conquer the world. Especially now. Try to convince me that every relevant rock band doesn't have at least some connective thread back to The Smiths. You see kids in hardcore bands unironically wearing "Meat Is Murder" shirts. Literal mountains of cash are just being left on the table because Johnny Marr wouldn't be caught dead in the same room as the mopey crooner. I also don't blame Andy and Mike for not wanting anything to do with the other twats, since they were screwed out of most of their fair share of helping create one of the most iconic English bands of all time. Listen to the bass in "Barbarism Begins At Home" or the drums in "The Queen Is Dead." That's worth a quarter of the royalties. If only Morrissey and Marr weren't such stingy manks. But alas, such is the most common and unsexy reason for bands breaking up—e.g., Nirvana. (Yes, misogynistic Courtney haters, look it up. Your favorite heroin addict actually retroactively reallocated the songwriting credits after the success of Nevermind to give himself 75% of the royalties. That was the real end of Nirvana as a band.)

Dead Kennedys

So, I could just go see Dead Kennedys sans Mr. Boucher, then go see Guantanamo School of Medicine and drink until the memory of the two concerts sorta blur together, but I would really, really love the opportunity to, at least once, see the classic lineup (Peligro, not Ted on drums). I mean, really, I'd love to go back in time to 1979 and see them at the Portland show where "Night Of The Living Rednecks" was recorded, but we haven't invented time travel yet, which is stupid. Still, once again, everyone is alive and kicking. Unfortunately, (once again) due to creative differences—cough—royalty disputes, Ray, D.H., and Klaus probably want nothing to do with Jello and vice versa. However, if it ever happened, I would pay full price for this blatant nostalgia cash-in. Listen to The Hard Times Podcast interview with Jello Biafra, and they paint a pretty awesome picture of what it would be like. Instead of pretending to have any integrity, make it the glitziest, glammiest, obscenely profit-driven show imaginable with Jello walking out with a fur coat and a pimp cane. Just make it completely non-punk. Unfortunately, Eric is sticking to his guns, and I gotta respect him for that. He's nothing if not consistent.

The Beatles (Holographic)

Before The Beatles were a cultural sensation, they were just a band. Now, they are neither. They are a product. I have no desire to see Paul McCartney play Beatles songs and "Live and Let Die" (does he even perform "Temporary Secretary?" Like what's the point if he doesn't?) I don't even want to see Paul and Ringo play with projections of the dead ones on the backdrop of the stage. Just drop the pretense and give us the Pepsi-sponsored, Live Nation presents holographic extravaganza. The technology is there. It started with Holo Tupac at the 2012 Coachella, and now ABBA is hiding being youngified versions of themselves. Fuck it! Just give us the Disney ride! Honestly, I don't even know if I'd wanna go back in time to the mid-'60s and see a 30-minute set of mostly covers in a baseball stadium. Maybe the Hamburg club shows. But, with holograms, you could just do a career-spanning extravaganza with the fab four magically morphing into each iconic era's costuming. Big finish encore on the rooftop of hologram Apple Corps. Someone pay me for this idea.

DINO-MYTE!

BY ESMERALDA RUPP-SPANGLE

EVERYTHING YOU NEVER NEEDED TO KNOW ABOUT DINOSAURS

This planet has been here for a damn sight longer than we have and, through its history, has been inhabited by a whole array of wacky creatures. From giant ground sloths that weighed up to 4 tons (Megatherium), to millipedes as long as a car (Arthropleura), to Glyptodonts (think of an armadillo with a turtle shell that's the size of a fucking Volkswagen). Our most enthusiastic collective fascination, however, is reserved for dinosaurs. With that in mind, let's review some of the more obscure, wacky, off-the-wall dinosaur-related facts.

Dino-Sex

How did dinosaurs get it on? Well, that's a damn good question, and science isn't in complete agreement on this controversial topic, but a popular and likely answer is "The same way that birds do, duh." Which is via a rather nasty procedure known as a "cloacal kiss." Don't be fooled by the name; this is not very nice. For those of you not in the know, a cloaca is a sort of tube where pretty much everything is expelled. Excrement, urine, semen, you name it. Just bonk two cloacas together, squirt baby juice from one bird to another, and that's pretty much it. It sure makes me wonder why we use the term "birds and the bees," cause like—ew.

Ain't love grand?

The Bone Wars

Much less awesomely known as the "Great Dinosaur Rush," this fact isn't exactly about dinosaurs but more about human greed. From around 1877-1892, a bizarre rivalry between Edward Drinker Cope and Othniel Charles Marsh developed, each using their personal wealth and influence to out-discover as many fossils as possible over the other. Hunting mostly in the fossil beds of Colorado, Nebraska, and Wyoming, they each resorted to bribery, theft, destruction of fossils, and incredibly sloppy paleontology, misidentifying countless specimens in their thirst for scientific supremacy. By the end of it, both were broke. On the upside, though, they did get their quarrel named after something that sounds like a Star Wars porno, and that's a hell of a legacy.

Dimetrodon Wasn't a Dinosaur

You heard me. During a pretty lousy time to be alive called the Permian, there were a number of not-a-dinosaur-but-hell-if-it-doesn't-look-like-ones, including Dimetrodon. Dinosaurs did exist during this time but were usually small and definitely not the kings they'd become. Dimetrodon and his fellow synapsids (mammal-like reptiles) were the big boys of the time, filling pretty much all the ecological niches for large animals. Unfortunately, a mass extinction bigger than the one that would go on to kill the dinosaurs ended their reign—known as "the Great Dying." This event was caused by a massive eruption of a super-volcano called the Siberian Traps, which spewed gargantuan amounts of greenhouse gases and ash into the atmosphere. 90-95% of life on Earth went kaput, including nearly every mammal-like reptile. The few that remained were wildly outgunned by di-nosaurus, who were more resistant to the extreme shittiness of Earth at that time. However, a few managed to scrape by—and good that they did, because they would go on to evolve into actual mammals over the next few million years, and ultimately us. So, thanks, great (x several million) grandpa Dimetrodon.

Duck-Billed Dinosaurs Sang With Their Headgear

In a truly bizarre new theory, some compelling new research has shown that many of the duck-billed dinosaurs had some unique nasal passages that looped from their schnozzes to their ornate head-crests, then passed into a couple of large air-chamber things attached to their throats. This suggests that if they sneezed (or pushed air through their nostrils, whatever), they would produce an array of noises. Think of the head crest as being something like their speaker system. Whether these sounds were for mating, danger alerts, screamo, or gossiping about Cathy in accounting's affair with Steve, we'll never know. What we do know, though, is that their voices were probably higher when they were younger and deeper as they aged, so at some point, one of them was definitely publicly embarrassed in choir when his voice cracked.

Let me sing you the song of my people.

T-Rex and His Stupid Arms

Why did T-Rex have those stubby little appendages? The answer is no one knows for sure. Classically, it was the opinion of science that they were an evolutionary holdover, like wisdom teeth or ass hair. Modern science has gotten more creative, though, and has proposed that they were for close combat slashing (as the musculature that supported their dopey little limbs was actually pretty fuckin' serious). Alternately, another theory states that they may have gotten smaller as a preventative measure for when there was a feeding frenzy—bigger arms might be more at risk of being torn off by your fellow T-Rexes. That would be a hell of a party foul, for sure—finger food in the very literal sense.

Dino Shit Is Everywhere

Known as "coprolites," fossilized dino shit can be found in abundance on this planet. They've been invaluable in our study of dinosaur behavior and diet and have thus been studied extensively for this reason. Coprolite is so common that you can even find necklaces, rings, bracelets, and earrings made from polished dino doo-doo all over the internet for a very modest price. The largest coprolite ever discovered measures 67.5 centimeters (2 feet 2.5 inches) and up to 15.7 centimeters (6.2 inches) wide. Affectionately known as "Barnum" (after Barnum Brown, who discovered the first T-Rex in 1902, not P.T. Barnum, though arguably, that would have been funnier). Because of Barnum's size, it's likely to have been crapped out by a large carnivore, though which one exactly is uncertain. Owned by coprolite collector George Frandsen, he's called it his "prized possession." There really is a hobby out there for everyone.

George and Barnum.

George and Barnum. While by no means exhaustive, I hope you found this overview to have provided at least a little super inappropiate dinner conversation (don't forget to wear your coprolite bracelet!). The Earth's history is filled with absurdity, after all.

Esmeralda Rupp-Spangle is a writer and aspiring coprolite collector. She can be reached via Instagram as @esmeraldacitadel or Facebook as Esmeralda Marina.

THE GHOST OF ORPHEUS: LUST AND OTHER SINS

by Elise Fontaine

Living Orpheus has left me with fond memories of his eagerness to devour me whole. The last piece of me lingers on his tongue, no matter who lives or dies. I never felt such complete desire and sincere longing from anyone else in my life. I can only hope that if I were the one gone now, he'd say the same had come from me to him.

Truthfully, I worry that I will not feel such a depth of yearning for complete union from another ever again. Either because such depth comes only once in a lifetime or because, in my adamant grief, I won't allow it to reach me again. How could I, when I feel Orpheus waiting for me at the edge of the beyond? Erect in his precision to ignite my psychic attention. My body aches for him each night, even after more than three years without his physical touch. Sometimes I sense him caught in the neither-neither, pulling me toward him but also pushing me back into the realm of the living because he knows love requires selflessness.

The mutual devotion between Orpheus and I that transcends the grave is an anachronistic view since we humans now live in a consume-or-be-consumed world, where catching feelings equates to weakness. Contemporary American society is a myopia, where sex is meant for the loveless, and pleasure has no place for those with hearts. Orpheus and I were meant to break that curse of separation. Love and pleasure can co-exist and co-arise, and we prove that equation to be true. The illusory destruction of love-pleasure interdependence is one and not the only reason today is so filled with violence, ignorance, and avarice.

But, enough of cyclical global issues. Orpheus and I have our own problems. Like how there's no way we can message incessantly now that he's ashes and light. And that's the sad thing about long-distance relationships: the lack of physical contact. It's also the sad thing about losing your lover to death. When he was alive, all too often, communication between Orpheus and I was a constant stream of messaging on Facebook.

"A relationship reduced to texts," I used to lament at the nadir of our affair.

This is probably one of the reasons I've grown to loathe that insipid platform that gave birth to my connection with Orpheus but also delivered the news of his death and foreshadowed it months earlier. If I could chat with Dead Orpheus now, Facebook could get back into my good graces. You'd better get on that, Zuck!

And since this data lives online somewhere anyway, I'll tell you of one of the wildest moments we shared while texting on Facebook Messenger, when Orpheus was at work late at night.

The fridge had collapsed inside the shelter/hostel. Food had spilled all over the linoleum. Old milk, moldy noodles, and half-drained Capri Suns, I imagine. If he had anything in there, it was a salad or a sandwich, maybe an orange or Persian cucumbers. That same day, someone had broken his car window. Needless to say, he was rather stressed. While texting me about his horrid day, he remained in good spirits. That was his nature...he'd laugh off the onslaught of annoyances and sheer absurdity and not get caught up in the frustration of it all. The musical laugh of Orpheus could transform Satan himself back into an angel of light.

After telling me all this awful news, I told Orpheus I'd rub his whole body when he got home from such a hellish day if I were there... at least in the same country as him, but obviously, the same city would be better. Right now, the same realm and same form would be best. You can't really massage the subtle body, and reaching all the way to Hades from here, would take a lot more magick than I know how to do.

Then, Orpheus wrote to me: "OK, so imagine for a moment that I walked through your door right this minute—tell me everything that happens after I walk in the door....."

"Fuuuuck," I responded.

"Kinda says it all," he joked.

"Even though I'd want to run and tackle you, I'd walk toward you slowly, with a giant smile and wide eyes. I'd wrap my arms around you like we were the last people on Earth. I'd look up at you, and you'd kiss me more deeply and passionately than I've ever been kissed. Our eyes would lock, and everything we've talked about would just be there, surging through our bodies like primordial firepower, and we'd see it in each other's eyes, despite its intangible invisibility. Each touch sends electricity through every cell...and desire just grows and flows through us until we're not sure who is who. In the delicious madness of it all, we crawl toward the bed. I pull away and stand before you..."

"Holy fuck, this is intense," he replied as he slipped into the washroom at work.

We sexted for the next thirty minutes. How he got away with it, I have no idea. I guess that's the advantage of working a graveyard.

"I very slowly remove all of my clothes to keep the tension alive—my shirt over my head. Then I unbutton and unzip my pants...pull them down...unclip my bra, and throw it across the room. Then, I get too impatient and rip off my panties and climb on top of you to tear off your clothes as fast as humanly possible! Finally, you grab me, kiss me and look into my eyes, and rub and squeeze my body, and I push my body against yours..."

"Oh my god... I'm so close already, and we aren't even fucking yet, hahaha."

The rest is too sexy for sharing. But, I will say that my favorite part of this sextcapade was after he finished and confessed that he had never done anything like that before. The same goes for me. That sums up the essence of our relationship. It was unlike anything I've ever experienced, which is why I was so eager to drink him up until the very last drop.

WINNING GRIEF

BY HANNAH ONE CUP

I recently had to experience one of the hardest losses I've gone through in my life, the loss of a friend who had been there for a decade. This dumb son of a bitch decided to up and leave while we were driving home one day. It happens, life sucks, and death is our birthright. But the death of a pet, a dog, seems to hit harder than any one death of a human.

This might be because humans are, in general (and painting with a very broad brush), total pieces of shit. And the fact that animals never see it coming. They are blissfully unaware of their impending death, or so I believe. I'm not a dog, so I can't exactly tell you what was going on in his pea-sized brain the few moments before it happened. But I like to think he was confused and possibly wondering what treats and how many mom was going to give him when he got back.

So, it happened, and I then had to drive him to the vet...to take care of the necessary accommodations for cremation. For the entirety of the drive to the vet, I was yelling and screaming at this guy, George, to wake up and stop being lazy. Yelling and screaming. But I knew what had happened. No amount of yelling, pets, or gentle shoves would alter this event or revert it back to what it had been three minutes earlier.

Details don't need to be gone into with the vet situation. They were as kind as any vet can be, and extremely tolerant of my irrational thrashing about. So, here is what happened the following week because, at this point, I'm just a husk of a person missing a shadow. Let's go into some detail about how I processed/am still processing grief so that you can maybe learn from my musings.

1. I showed up at my favorite bar, Joe's, immediately after, where everyone already knew what had happened due to my partner informing people and also being there to greet me. Because I was wearing makeup, I did my best to stop looking like a sobbing mess whose life was just altered in a blink of an eye. I love raccoons, but raccoon eyes are awful and not sexy... like, I planned on having sex that night. I'm so funny. I was bought several rounds of margaritas and tequila shots, given many kind wishes and hugs, and a funny bit was said about how I mentioned I always had a resting bitch face, but tonight my face looked different (very funny, you).

2. I proceeded to drink through the weekend, to try not to process things. Alcohol really helped here. My eyes began to look like swelled-up cotton balls that could barely open. I'm sure a mix of dehydration caused by alcohol and sobbing will do that. I was as lovely as I have ever been. Went to more bars; I don't remember half of what happened this weekend.

3. I then took Monday and Tuesday off...to actually attempt to start processing. This was also when I decided that he really wasn't coming back, and I needed to pack up his things. I still have his things—they aren't going anywhere. I just can't look at them right now, or I'll get those cotton ball-raccoon eyes again. I just started wearing make-up again, so leave me alone with that.

4. My partner took me on adventures on Monday and Tuesday. We went to a reptile museum out in the middle of nowhere, and I almost stole a very friendly turtle—because turtles live for, like...100 years, which would mean I'd theoretically never have to process this sort of grief again. But, alas, I did not steal the turtle. I'd be lying if I said I hadn't already planned out where I was going to keep the stolen turtle and the adventures I could have had walking him around town and the various shrubs I'd let them eat. Grief makes you crazy. I think I was pretty rational not to have stolen the turtle in the first place.

5. Tuesday, we went and ate a burger at some place that made smash burgers (I literally had no idea this type of burger had a name, I just knew this was how my dad made burgers) and went to see the Bob's Burgers movie. My partner snuck in some of my disgusting Old Grand Dad (not bonded, so yuck) and mixed it into our Pepsi brand root beer we ordered. Side note, a medium-sized beverage is the size of a regular-sized newborn baby. Why is America so fat?

6. After Tuesday, I had to go back to work. My boss called me and asked that I "not kill myself." He then attempted to rewind and say, "I meant...don't work too hard." I told him it was one or the other, but if he wanted me to have the day off, he should just tell me, so I can go kill myself off the clock. He didn't laugh as much as I thought he would.

7. Thursday was when things started to churn in my brain, and my emotions were all over the place. I thought I had made it to the "acceptance" stage, but apparently, grief likes to take its own routes, and whether or not you actually have accepted something as fact, you might get to relive the grief over...and over...and over again. Thursday was laundry day. Usually, an easy task and not one that requires much willpower, but everything weighs 100 lbs. or more when your body is grieving, so this was work.

I was about to take my laundry out of the communal dryer when some old bitty decided that today was the day she was going to remove my laundry...again. Yes, she's done this before. Not a minute after, the alarm went off. So, me being the rational adult I was at the time, I looked her dead in the eyes and slapped my hands against each other, berating her and talking as if I was attempting to give a stern lesson to an 8-year-old who just pushed some kid off a swing.

I removed my laundry by shoving her out of the way (mind you, she is like...82 years old) and left the laundry room screaming multiple profanities until I got to our apartment door. I screamed so hard that our roommate's dog barked. She has never talked or even looked me in the eye since. I win.

8. I then went back to Joe's and attempted, poorly, to do standup.

All in all, I think I might be winning this grief thing. That turtle better look out, though.

Hannah One Cup can be found drinking all your liquor and texting you at 3 in the morning, explaining how much she appreciates you. She also does standup sometimes and is currently in the middle of summer, where she makes an overabundance of Hawaiian Macaroni Salad that needs to get eaten by someone. She appreciates everyone that gave her their time and love and thanks all who ever showed George a bit of love.

THE MONTHLY

COLUMN

BY WOMBSTRETCHA THE MAGNIFICENT

WILL IT SMOKE?

Summer is upon us, and though weather patterns seem to be quite unpredictable, we here in the Pacific Northwest understand that these are our three months where it's not raining constantly. In celebration of this, many of us do delightful and pleasant recreational things, such as visiting our beaches or coastal environs, camping in our forests, and, of course, engaging in the fine art of barbecue.

Barbecue has a storied history, which I won't get into, as that'd be an article in of itself. However, my recent interests have involved the barbecue grill's cousin: the smoker.

For gear, I have a mid-level vertical pellet smoker. Not one of those fancy ones or anything, as I ain't got that kinda dough. It's basically just a box with smoke in it. A couple of hundred bones, it cost me. Now, perhaps you're thinking, "well, fuck you, that's still more than I care to pay to smoke things, I got kids to feed and strippers to tip," well, you're right. If it's not accessible, then why bother? However, hope is not lost. One can get that sweet-ass smoke, even if all you have is a teeny little charcoal Hibachi grill or a flaming garbage can. Search for a device called a "smoke tube"—a ten-to-twenty-dollar-ish little contraption that can hold wood chips or pellets and will bring the smoke flavor to you for cheap!

I was once told by a pit master at a barbecue joint that "smoke turns time into flavor," and I cannot disagree. I've had a few cabinet smokers over the years and a number of grills. I recently picked up a new smoker on sale, which I initially thought of as a smoky meat bookcase...and then, something got into my head. Something weird—something that was like Kevin Costner in "Field of Dreams" weird. A little voice in the back of my head, which instead of "if you build it, they will come," said, "smoke fucking everything." I listened to this voice.

Now, I'm not the world's best barbecuer, nor am I the worst. Fairly average, I'd say. I've smoked plenty of pork butts, briskets, ribs, sausages, and all the usual picnic fare, and people ate them with no complaints or sudden illness/death. Over the last little while, however, I've decided to put myself to the test, though it is entirely possible I'm neck-deep in some kind of...barbecue psychosis. Either way, I wanted to see how deep down the smoked-stuff rabbit hole I could go. Precise instructions will not be provided, as all smokers and grills differ; plus, I'd rob you all of the joy of discovery, but I'll give you the gist.

The whole endeavor took a turn from the traditional into the odd, and I'm not looking back. I intend to smoke life itself, or at least anything I can eat. Though, what did I actually do in my smoke mania?

Well, here's the list. Not ranked in any particular order.

Pie

You can smoke pie. The pie I smoked was a pot pie, so definitely on the savory side. Sweet pies may indeed be smoked, and if you're messin' around, I'd suggest strawberry-rhubarb for that. However, a pot pie, as people often make (or just buy from the store, let's not kid ourselves), can indeed be cooked to perfection in a smoker at oven temps for about an hour-ish. Also, when you smoke a pot pie, the crust edges don't get burnt like in an oven unless you fall asleep, awaken 8 hours later wondering what that smell is, yell, "Oh shit," run out back, tear your sock on a nail, trip, smash your face on the ground, and lay there, covered in blood, weeping for your pot pie.

Cheesecake

Yeah, cheesecake.

You see, a smoker is a lot like an oven. You can track temperatures and keep time, and while it's not as consistent as an oven, it comes with smoke flavor.

I hickory-smoked a cheesecake just like you'd bake one in an oven. Same deal, just smoke it hot until it resembles a proper...fucking cheesecake. Smoking stuff involves a lot of poking. Poke often, and if your poking spear comes out clean, you're probably good.

Of note, I am pretty sure this made someone at my backyard BBQ have a spontaneous orgasm.

Sauerkraut

Sauerkraut is somewhat controversial. Well, not "controversial" in that it sparks arguments, but you really either love it or you hate it. If pickled cabbage isn't on your playlist, don't bother, but if it is, you can smoke it for an hour at a low temperature, and it'll be the best damn 'kraut you could ask for. I've had to put up a fence to keep hungry Germans off my property.

Stuffing

Yeah, like you'd put in a turkey or serve with pork chops. Bread soaks up smoke. You really only need like ten minutes or so to get a smoke-drenched pile of stale bread and herbs to go with dinner. When I made this, turkeys walked on to my lawn out of nowhere and begged to be crammed full of it.

Gravy

Yup, you can smoke gravy. It doesn't matter what kind. Keep the heat low and smoke it for a half-hour. It'll make you want to kick people in the head, make meatloaf out of their supple head-meats, and dump the gravy on that headloaf.

Condiments

Yes. You can actually smoke mayonnaise. Put a dish of it above a bowl of ice and smoke it at a fairly low temperature for a short time, and you can have "smayo." The same goes for mustard or even ketchup, but those do not need the ice. Even if you were to put smoked condiments on a nasty fast-food burger, it'd make it seem like it came from one of those places where you get looked at with disdain by the staff for existing.

Mashed Potatoes

I am 100% into this. Smoking makes even those lame instant mashed potatoes into gods among tubers. You may scoff, but this is probably the best invention since people learned how to jack off. Smoke 'em at whatever temp, high or low, for about a half-hour. Warning, though: you will never again be satisfied by regular mashed taters.

Fruit Snacks

Yes, I actually did this. I smoked them. Not gonna lie; I may have gone a little nuts. Though I did eat them, I'm still not sure if they were good or bad. Imagine a fruit snack with a savory wood-smoke flavor on top of its sugary tone. Has science gone too far?

A Sneaker I Found in the Street

One of those "dad sneakers," but just one. I always wonder about the circumstances that lead to only one shoe being in the street. My assumption is that someone had to run from an angry dog or something, then one of their shoes fell off, but they kept on going. Anyhow, I gave the sneaker to my angry dog, who likes chasing people, and he seemed to enjoy gnawing on it.

Well, that's the list, so if you needed any ideas for your backyard barbecue events, I hope you are now inspired to push the boundaries, all in the name of deliciousness.
